Acknowledgments

I am very grateful for the institutional, intellectual, and moral support I have received in researching and writing this book. The many people who have helped me deserve more thanks than I can possibly give, but permit me to share a small part of my gratitude.

This project began in 1988 as a dissertation on the Speaker's role in the budget process under the direction of Charles O. Jones at the University of Virginia. Chuck figured most prominently in the innovation and development of the dissertation and the book. I have benefited tremendously from his wisdom, time, and encouragement; we should all be so lucky to work with such a knowledgeable scholar, patient advisor, and caring friend. I am also indebted to James Ceaser, whose persistence, enthusiasm, and good humor helped me through the most difficult parts of the dissertation, and whose suggestions for key transitions in the book have survived numerous rounds of editing. Randall Strahan and John Gilmour carefully reviewed the entire manuscript and made many thoughtful suggestions that have been incorporated into the text. Several other political scientists commented on parts of the manuscript, including Martha Derthick, John Whelan, Tom Morris, Ronald Peters, and Steve Van Beek. In addition, Tom Sheehy, Oscarlyn Brown, and Pat Thiel provided timely technical assistance at various stages of the project. I also thank Bert Rockman, Frank Moone, and Kathy McLaughlin at the University of Pittsburgh Press, who facilitated the production of the book, Pipp Letsky, who edited the manuscript, and Jane Flanders, who indexed it.

Several institutions deserve special recognition for their support. The Lynde and Harry Bradley Foundation, the Everett McKinley Dirksen Congressional Center, the Robert H. Horwitz Memorial Trust, and the University of Richmond Summer Research Grant Program all contributed generous funds that allowed me to concentrate my efforts on research and writing. The Brookings Institution granted me special guest privileges, including a desk and a telephone, while I was in Washington. And I am obliged to the members of Congress and staff personnel who took time to speak with me during my stay at Brookings and thereafter.

Finally, I wish to convey the deepest appreciation to my family. Special thanks goes to Jennifer, who has been with me every step of the way, first as my girlfriend, then as my fiancée, and now as my wife. Her computer expertise and editorial skill are surpassed only by her love and patience. Above all, I wish to acknowledge the contribution of my parents. While others have educated me in the ways of researching and writing, they have taught me the values that I apply to my life and work. I owe them the dedication of my first book and much, much more.

Of course, the time, effort, resources, and thoughtful contributions of others have only enhanced the quality of this book. I am responsible for any remaining errors, omissions, or shortcomings.
